Native Fishes of the Navajo River: The Navajo River is tributary of the San Juan River in the Colorado River Basin. Many unique species are only found in the Colorado River Basin, making it a fascinating place to observe highly evolved species. All of these species are protected on Jicarilla Apache Nation Lands

Roundtail Chub (Illustration 1): A species of concern throughout its range. Listed as New Mexico State Endangered. Prefers large low velocity pool habitats with large boulder or woody debris. Favored diet can include invertebrates and smaller fishes. Can grow up to 20" in length.

Flannelmouth Sucker (Illustration 2): Long lived sucker species does not reach maturity until seven years of age. Females can produce up to 40,000 eggs. Threats to this species include hybridization and competition for limited resources with non-native sucker species.

Bluehead Sucker (Illustration 3): Distinctive horseshoe shaped mouth with a pronounced scraping ridge. Bluehead sucker can occupy rivers with steeper gradient and cooler water temperatures. Threats to this species include hybridization and competition for limited resources with non-native sucker species.

Speckled Dace (Illustration 4): Mostly feed during nighttime hours. The smallest species of native fish in the Navajo River, they can grow to approximately 6". During breeding season males will get orange "lipstick" around the mouth and near the pectoral fins.

Mottled Sculpin (Illustration 5): Sculpin in the Navajo River are usually tan to dark green; the mottled patterns for which they are named usually appear black in color. These fish build rock burrows for their eggs which the males will defend.
